Australia Genealogy Sites

- RecordSearch: The National Archives of Australia Online

RecordSearch is the National Archives of Australia collection database. It contains descriptions of 80,000 collections and over 4 million record items as well as details of about 9,000 Australian Government agencies. Every year the National Archives of Australia adds hundreds of thousands of new descriptions.

You can search for descriptions of documents, photographs, posters, maps, films, sound recordings. Please point your browsers to:

http://www.naa.gov.au/The\_Collection/recordsearch.html

- Ireland-Australia Transportation Records Database

The National Archives of Ireland holds a wide range of records relating to transportation of convicts from Ireland to Australia covering the period 1788 to 1868. In some cases these include records of members of convicts' families transported as free settlers.

To mark the Australian Bicentenary in 1988, the Taoiseach presented microfilms of the most important of these records to the Government and People of Australia as a gift from the Government and People of Ireland. A computerized index to the records was prepared with the help of IBM and is available for use at various locations in Australia.

While the collection of convict petitions dates from the beginning of transportation from Ireland to Australia in 1791, all transportation registers compiled before 1836 were destroyed in the Four Courts fire of June 1922. Therefore, if the person you are researching was convicted before 1836, but was not the subject of a petition, he or she will not appear on this database.

Online searching is available by pointing your browsers to:

<http://www.nationalarchives.ie/topics/transportation/search01.html>.

Australian and New Zealand Records at RootsWeb

This free database contains 795768 records (71363 distinct surnames). The data was contributed by volunteers and contains book indexes, burials, court appointments, military records, newspaper indexes, passenger lists, vital statistics, registries and name lists.

The database is searchable by Surname Only (the minimal requirement), Surname and First Name, record type and location. Please point your browser at <http://userdb.rootsweb.com/aus/>

- Australasia Births, Deaths and Marriages Exchange

This Web site is a free resource to genealogists who wish to share information about details of births, deaths or marriages from Australian and New Zealand vital records. The goal of this site is to save a fellow researcher from making an unnecessary purchase. In addition their submission may save you time and money. You are invited to participate in a wider effort to make vital records available to everyone, without the restriction of membership to an organization.

- Access all the information submitted at no cost or voluntarily upgrade your account for advanced search access and support the site.
- Participate in a unique project and be credited with the records you contribute, while safeguarding the privacy of your contact information.
- Retain control over the records in your possession and have unrestricted access to submissions you have made, amendable at any time.
- Keep track of your vital records by using ausbdm.org as your personal database, with the ability to download your records.

Ireland Genealogy Related Internet Sites

Beginning Your Irish Research on the Right Foot

Mention Irish research and many genealogists groan. That's because on 13 April, 1922, a disastrous fire in the Four Courts building (the Public Record Office) in Dublin, Ireland, destroyed virtually all pre-1901 Irish census records, wills, and Church of Ireland parish registers. The result is that Irish genealogical research is more difficult than research in the rest of the British Isles -- More difficult, but not entirely impossible in many instances.

Because the loss of many Irish records, it is highly important that you start your Irish genealogical research in the country of immigration (for example, the United States, Canada, Australia, or New Zealand). Make a comprehensive search of available records in the country of immigration. Search out family traditions; birth, marriage and death records; obituaries; cemetery records; wills; Bibles; census records; plus immigration and naturalization records. Look for the full names of your immigrant ancestors; their dates of birth and/or marriage in Ireland; their place of residence in Ireland; their religion, occupation; dates of emigration, etc. This preliminary research will greatly increase the probability of actually locating Irish records. To have the best chance of success, it is necessary to know at least four things:

- The name of the family
- The parish or townland in which they lived
- The approximate date
- Religious affiliation

A few records were saved from the conflagration and many records can be located at local levels. Reconstructing lost records has been the quest of both historians and genealogists, who have compiled substitute records, plus made available various indices, abstracts, and transcriptions of records that were created before the fire. Despite these gallant efforts, serious gaps in Irish records remain.

In addition, the highly important registers of births, deaths and marriages, which are indexed by quarters, were not housed in the Four Courts building and so did not burn. Most of these vital records date from 1864. Records for births, deaths and Catholic marriages commenced in 1864. Records for non-Catholic marriages date from 1845. The quarterly indices are available on microfilm through the Family History Library in Salt Lake City. Once a record has been located in an index, it can be ordered from either the General Register Office of Ireland (Dublin) or the General Register Office of Northern Ireland (Belfast).

In addition, there is information available on the Internet. As with other research, you should know the surname, place or residence and approximate date so that you can effectively focus your search on pertinent Web sites.
